Georgia Perimeter College Clarkston Campus

The City of Clarkston is known by the phrase “Where Possibilities Grow” and is noted for its diversity. Clarkston owes much of its beginnings to the Georgia Railroad. In the 1830s, the Georgia Railroad built a rail line through what is present day Clarkston to connect the merchants of Athens with outlets in Augusta and South Carolina.

The City of Clarkston was officially chartered by Governor Alexander H. Stevens on December 12, 1882. Clarkston was named in honor of Colonel W.W. Clark, a Covington Lawyer and a Director of the Georgia Railroad. Because the railroad made Atlanta so accessible for commuting, Clarkston became a community of homeowners who worked in Atlanta. Clarkston became one of the South’s first “suburban” communities. Commuting citizens accounted for much of Clarkston’s early growth.

In the 1990s, refugee asylum programs in the United States identified Clarkston as a good fit for displaced persons of many different backgrounds. By the 2000s, the local high school had students from more than 50 countries and by some estimates, half the population was from outside the U.S. Clarkston is home to the central campus of the Georgia Perimeter College and Georgia Piedmont Technical College.

Clarkston is also the home of the DeKalb Symphony Orchestra, based at Georgia Perimeter College’s Clarkston Campus. Of the 85 players in the full orchestra, only a core of 12 are paid a small stipend to act as principal players. The other 76 are volunteer players from the community. DSO plays up to eight concerts each year including the Subscription Series, Children’s Concert, Picnic Pops Concerts, Free Community Concerts, and special performances.

Clarkston has remained a small city that encompasses approximately 700 acres or 1.1 square miles. Citizens of Clarkston enjoy a commitment to being a walking and biking community. Today, the railroad still runs through Clarkston as a steadfast reminder of the city’s historic beginning.

PARKS & RECREATION

In 2011, the City of Clarkston received a grant from USTA (United States Tennis Association) that allowed for the repair and resurfacing of the two existing tennis courts and convert them into one court with four 36 foot permanent courts and one 78 foot court with 60 food blended lines. The City of Clarkston facility is the first municipal facility in the country to have completed this conversion.

The USTA 10 and under initiative – which incorporates the "Quickstart" format of playing tennis, allows kids to learn real tennis and have fun doing it. 10 and under tennis follows almost every other youth sport and uses rackets, balls, and courts that are sized right for kids so that they can enjoy and stay in the game right from the start.

In 2012, Clarkston completed the Milam Park Renovation Project. With the completion of this renovation project, Clarkston residents have access to modern playground equipment, refurbished restrooms, renovated multipurpose recreation areas for soccer and baseball, new parking surfaces, refurbished pavilions with new grills and a new ADA compliant ramp and sidewalk that provides full accessibility to the entire park.
